Long ago, before Islam, people’s health in Arabia was generally poor. The quality of drinking water was not good and it was scarce. The supply of food was irregular. Diseases spread quickly in the hot climate and in the dusty winds. Some of the most common were malaria, smallpox, leprosy and eye diseases like trachoma and glaucoma. Some of them were carried by flies and mosquitoes. Local remedies were given to those who were ill, but the remedies often did not work. There were no hospitals. As their civilization expanded, the Arabs learned from the old Greek, Persian, Byzantine and Indian cultures. Information and ideas concerning health and medicine were translated into Arabic. Arab doctors like Ar-Razi and Ibn Sina worked with these ideas scientifically. They observed people’s illness. They experimented with new medicines in order to cure people.
